Businesses face multiple areas of risk, encompassing cyber-attacks, pandemics, natural disasters, human error, among others. A risk in business continuity represents the potential for unexpected financial and non-financial setbacks, like data loss, property damage, and harm to reputation, arising from disruptions in critical business operations.

Establishing a robust business continuity plan becomes imperative for an organisation, ensuring the preservation of its vitality and reputation. Such planning serves as a lifeline during major crises or incidents, facilitating the continuation of operations. Business continuity strategy typically revolves around safeguarding People (staff and customers), Processes (both technical and operational), Premises and Providers (plus Partners) - often referred to as 'The Four P's.'
